Absence of a relationship between two metabolic complications of intestinal malabsorption and the growth or development of infants with short bowel syndrome. The rate of weight gain of 36 infants with short bowel syndrome (SBS) was compared with that of their age-matched control group (CG). Infants with SBS are at high risk of obesity and diabetes. Subsequently, two dietary protocols were designed to obtain more precise data about the nutrients needed for growth and development. In the first protocol, 44 infants (age range: 4-14 mo) with SBS were studied; their weight increased from approximately +3.5 to +15.1 kg during the study. The weight gain was lower in infants who had SBS (6.9 +/- 0.6 kg) than in the CG (13.7 +/- 1.2 kg), but not significantly so (P less than 0.05). The first protocol showed that infants with SBS grew at a rate faster than their CG. A formula adjusted for energy, protein and fiber (30 kcal/100 kcal, 4 g/100 kcal and 5 g/100 kcal, respectively) was administered to 14 SBS infants for 8-12 mo. The infant's growth rate was similar (P greater than 0.05) to that of their control group. The energy intake of infants fed on formula was significantly higher than that of infants fed on breast milk (P less than 0.05). The calorie-to-protein ratio of their diets (13.4 +/- 0.5 kcal/g protein) was also high, which could be harmful. These results indicate that a high calorie-to-protein intake cannot account for the low growth rate of SBS infants. The second study protocol was designed to assess the possibility that these metabolic alterations were caused by the concomitant presence of metabolic complications of intestinal malabsorption. In this study, no evidence was found that two metabolic complications of intestinal malabsorption (abnormal glucose tolerance and low serum levels of immunoreactive insulin and high serum levels of glucagon) were induced by an increased calorie-to-protein intake and resulted in the acceleration of weight gain.
